cotton bills of lading aroused fresh hopes that a compromise would be arrived at, which would avoid disturbance of the money and exchange markets in the financing of the important cotton export movement. With this complication removed, there would be very little doubt left of the sufficiency of money market resources for the needs of the movement of crops. The confidence in the money and banking position is based not only on the face of the incoming returns from national banks to the controller's office, but on the tone of more detailed information from banking sources, banking saminers and other authorities. From these it is shown that the charester we well as the volume of the	SALES. 100 Amer. Agri.
